The Abortion Industry Continues to Invent New Ways to Kill Babies

An abortion giant's WhatsApp chatbot tells African women and girls the pills are "safe." They aren't.

Just how far will the abortion industry go to put pills into the hands of African women?

We at Population Research Institute (PRI) decided to find out.

We opened WhatsApp and messaged "Nurse Nisa," a chatbot built by Ipas, the North Carolina-based abortion giant, together with the tech firm Dimagi. It operates in Kenya and the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Within a few messages "Nurse Nisa" — who of course is not a nurse at all — had assured us that abortion pills are safe for "women and girls of all ages," sent us a link to an online pregnancy calculator, and walked us through taking 12 misoprostol pills.

The website behind that link went further: misoprostol, it said, can be

IPAS and the Sustainable Abortion Ecosystem

BY CARLOS POLO, DIRECTOR, PRI IBERO-AMERICA

IPAS used to be known as the main promoter of Manual Vacuum Aspirators—little handheld suction abortion machines that it shipped by the millions to the developing world.

But IPAS—the name is an acronym for International Pregnancy Advocacy Services—has grown ambitious of late. It is no longer content to simply provide the means for women to terminate their pregnancies.

The first hint of IPAS's expanding ambitions came when it participated in the New York Times campaign against El Salvador, which misrepresented a case of infanticide—a woman had killed her newborn daughter—as an abortion. Then came IPAS's intervention before the Supreme Court of Nicaragua to argue that the law abolishing therapeutic abortion was unconstitutional and its criticism of the Mexico City Policy in a congressional hearing.

Over the past few years IPAS has gone even further, transforming itself into a highly specialized transnational network dedicated to creating what it calls "Sustainable Abortion Ecosystems" in country after country.

A "Sustainable Abortion Ecosystem" is a social, cultural, legal and medical environment within which abortion-on-demand is not only accessible but acceptable; no more questioned than a tooth extraction. You might call it mainstreaming abortion.

According to IPAS, a Sustainable Abortion Ecosystem has eight moving parts: individual knowledge and autonomy; social norms and community support; political leadership; legislation; financing; products; healthcare workforce and service delivery; and health information.

Each of these parts reinforce the others.

A favorable law facilitates financing. Financing makes it possible to acquire medications and train professionals. Professionals make it possible to expand services. Cultural campaigns modify social attitudes. And changed social attitudes can in turn assist the passage of favorable laws.

The organization that was once content to send out MVAs is now engaging in social engineering and cultural imperialism on a grand scale.

IPAS intervenes in laws, but also in those who draft them; in medical services, but also in those who provide them; in medications, but also in the chains that make it possible to distribute them; and in people, but also in the social norms that determine how those people interpret abortion.

Technology to Reproduce the Model

At the same time, IPAS has not only continued, but has also greatly expanded its efforts to transfer technology.

IPAS develops and disseminates clinical technologies, pharmacological protocols, manuals, training programs, intervention methodologies, and digital tools that can be transferred to professionals and institutions in different countries.

MVAs are not simply shipped, they come with guides, protocols, training materials, and distribution systems around it. The same is true with the Abortion Pill: IPAS defines protocols for the use of mifepristone and misoprostol, trains professionals, informs users, and works to incorporate these drugs into healthcare systems.

IPAS even runs an entire university dedicated to different ways to eliminate unborn children.

IPAS University offers courses on medication abortion, uterine evacuation, manual aspiration, and other subjects related to its procedures.

Finally, there is VCAT, short for Values Clarification and Attitude Transformation, a methodology designed to weaken resistance to abortion while fostering attitudes of acceptance and support for ending an unborn child's life.

No Sustainable Abortion Ecosystem can survive without popular support, even if it has to be manufactured.

The scale of IPAS's efforts comes through in the organization's own reports.

In 2022, its Latin American office reported having reached more than 1.6 million people with information about self-managed abortion with pills. Between 2023 and 2025, its chatbot "Sofía" was used by more than 39,000 people, while another digital resource, "Te Acompaño," accumulated more than 51,000 visits. A video about abortion with misoprostol exceeded 5.3 million views.

> "IPAS even runs an entire university dedicated to different ways to eliminate unborn children."

To view IPAS solely as an NGO that promotes abortion grossly understates its ambitions.

IPAS wants nothing less than for abortion to become both widely available and widely accepted, even celebrated, in the societies it seeks to influence.

That's why it is not content to modify a law; medications must be ensured. It is not enough to have medications available; professionals must be trained. It is not enough to train professionals; attitudes must be transformed, financing guaranteed, networks created, information generated, and political backing built.

An entire ecosystem must be built around abortion that that makes its expansion inevitable, and its reversal almost unthinkable.

IPAS's actions deserve to be studied carefully by the pro-life movement.

For decades, the debate over abortion focused on one fundamental question: Is it legal or illegal?

The international abortion movement has moved beyond this in its efforts to reshape society itself.

IPAS' strategy highlights the fact that major political and cultural transformations rarely depend on a single law, a single organization, or a single campaign. They occur when different elements begin to function together until they turn what was previously exceptional into a stable part of the system.

Pro-lifers have a lot of work to do.

bought at a pharmacy, "sometimes without a prescription."

PRI has been watching Ipas for more than three decades. In 1991, we reported that Ipas was spreading its manual vacuum aspirators through Kenya, Zaire, and other developing countries, where abortions could be done under the label of "miscarriage treatment." Ipas has since traded in some of its vacuum pumps for a smartphone app, but the deception continues.

'Safe' for girls?

Nisa's opening line is breezy: "Safi! Let's talk about abortion." The pills, she assures us, are safe for "women and girls of all ages."

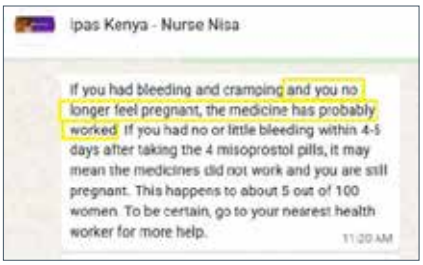

Says who? Not the drug labels. The U.S. label for mifepristone admits that the drug's effects by age "have not been investigated." The label for misoprostol carries a caution for women over 35 and heavy smokers, who were left out of its trials. The manufacturers don't know the answers. Ipas's chatbot claims to know them for every schoolgirl who logs on.

A recipe for incomplete abortion

Nisa tells women to take ibuprofen with the pills. But misoprostol, one of the abortion pills, is a prostaglandin, and it works by forcing the uterus to contract. Ibuprofen blocks prostaglandins. Experts have warned that combining the two invites an incomplete abortion, which leaves tissue in the womb that can cause hemorrhage and infection, even death. Ipas' fake nurse says nothing about this.

How will a woman know the abortion worked? If she has bled and cramped and "no longer feel(s) pregnant," Nisa says, "the medicine has probably worked."

Probably. Bleeding and cramping come with incomplete abortions too. They are also signs of a ruptured ectopic pregnancy, which kills women and which the pills do nothing to treat.

The old disguise

Then comes the instruction that would make any real nurse blanch. Nisa tells women to prepare "what to tell the healthcare provider if you do not want to or feel you cannot safely tell the provider you took abortion pills." The care they will receive, she notes, is the same care given after a miscarriage.

There it is again: abortion passed off as miscarriage. In 1991 it was Ipas's vacuum aspirator. In 2026 it is a script for the emergency room, one that keeps a hemorrhaging woman's doctor in the dark about what is killing her.

Where the links lead

Before buying pills, Nisa sends women to a "pregnancy calculator" run by Women on Web. That mail-order abortion outfit will even ship pills to women who are not yet pregnant, to keep on hand. Its medical screening asks about three rare conditions and then shrugs, "If you are not already aware of them, you probably don't have them."

We told the site we were 30 weeks pregnant. Women on Web declined to ship. It then assured us that "abortion with pills is also safe and effective after 14 weeks or more."

That is false. The FDA approves mifepristone only through 10 weeks, and the dangers climb steeply after that. Women on Web then helpfully added that misoprostol is sold in pharmacies "sometimes without a prescription." A woman seven months pregnant, carrying a baby who could survive outside the womb, was pointed toward the pharmacy counter.

Getty Images/NickyLloyd

In Kenya, that points her toward breaking the law as well. Kenya's constitution declares that life begins at conception. It permits abortion only when a trained health professional finds that the mother's life or health is in danger.

Nothing for the mother who wants her baby

In all our conversations, Nisa never asked why we wanted an abortion or whether someone was forcing us into it. She offered no prenatal care, no pregnancy center, no help with rent or food, and no word about adoption. A mother who wants to keep her baby gets nothing.

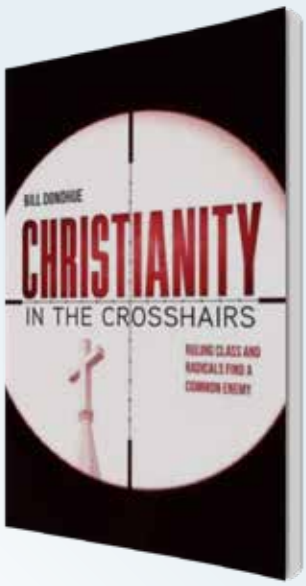

Her only advice about other people was to "share plans with someone you can trust." For a girl whose abuser is the one demanding the abortion, that sends her straight back to him.

This is what Western "reproductive health" looks like in Africa these days: foreign money and foreign ideology, delivered anonymously through a phone app that treats the African child as a problem to be solved.

African women deserve real nurses, real doctors, and real help for themselves and their babies. Ipas's phony "nurse" has only one prescription, and it leads to death.

Christianity in the Crosshairs: Ruling Class and Radicals Find a Common Enemy

Is Christianity under attack in America? In Christianity in the Crosshairs, Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League, delivers a forceful examination of the cultural and political forces that are working to marginalize Christianity and undermine the traditional values that have shaped American society.

Drawing on decades of defending Catholics against religious discrimination and cultural hostility, Donohue argues that powerful elites have joined forces with radical activists to reshape America's institutions, weaken religious liberty, and diminish the influence of faith and family. From the halls of government to the media, education, and corporate America, he examines how these forces seek to transform society and discourage resistance to their vision of the future.

At the heart of Donohue's argument is a sobering warning: the greatest threats to freedom do not always come through open tyranny. But Donohue does not call on the faithful to despair. He reminds readers that Christianity remains a powerful force for defending human dignity, protecting the family, and preserving the moral foundations of a free society.

For Catholics concerned about the future of their faith, their families, and the freedoms they cherish, Christianity in the Crosshairs offers a timely examination of the cultural battles unfolding around them. As St. Paul reminds us, our struggle is "against the world rulers of this present darkness" (Ephesians 6:12). Now is not the time for Christians to retreat from the public square. It is time to stand firm in the truth and defend the faith for future generations.

Freedom is on the Rise in Latin America

Following the closure of USAID, Latin Americans are taking back their countries

BY STEVEN W. MOSHER

Editor's Note: For years PRI worked to defund and shut down USAID's many anti-life, anti-family programs. Then Trump came along and shut down the entire corrupt organization. And the people of Latin America are taking their countries back.

Democracy is on a roll in Latin America. Since President Donald Trump took office, conservatives have been winning election after election south of the border.[1] And Trump's closure of USAID is an important reason why.

The latest victory came in Colombia, a country perhaps best known for cocaine and corruption. Conservative Abelardo de la Espriella squeaked out a victory over the socialist Gustavo Petro on a platform of restoring law and order, stamping out the cartels and—necessarily—building prisons. Lots of prisons.

The string of conservative victories began shortly after Trump's election with the victory of incumbent Daniel Noboa in Ecuador, and has been picking up steam ever since. The Latin American left has now been kicked to the curb in Bolivia, Honduras, Chile, Costa Rica, Peru, and now Colombia.

Together with the conservative governments already in power, namely, El Salvador, Argentina, Paraguay, Panama, and the Dominican Republic, conservative governments now outnumber left-wing ones in the region 12 to 7, or almost two to one.

With the remaining communist dictatorships in the region—Cuba, Nicaragua, and Venezuela—under severe economic and military pressure, the remaining leftist dominos seem certain to continue to fall.

All of this marks a stunning reversal from the Biden years, when left-wing governments outnumbered conservative ones two to one.

Elections in Latin America, like democratic elections everywhere, largely turn on domestic issues—whether a nation's economy is growing or stagnating, whether its people feel secure in their homes or threatened by rising crime rates, whether its current leaders are popular or despised.

But with the entire region moving rightward at once, it's clear that something bigger is afoot.

There is no question that the election of a pro-business, anti-crime populist in the United States has galvanized Latin American conservatives. Other countries are being drawn along in the Trump administration's powerful wake.

However, I believe that most observers are missing the biggest factor of all: With President Trump's closure of USAID, the Latin American Left's chief political organizer and cash cow died.

You see, USAID did not just pour billions of dollars into every leftist fantasy project imaginable. Even more importantly, the aid agency was the organizing principle—and chief funder—of an international coalition of donors who financed, legitimized, and professionalized a broad cultural agenda.

Disguising its aims under innocent-sounding words—development, inclusion, rights, sustainability, and cooperation—the coalition pushed a wide array of left-wing causes from abortion, gender ideology, and LGBTQ activism, to radical feminism, radical environmentalism, and open borders.

The USAID-led coalition would sometimes exert direct diplomatic pressure on national governments to embrace this agenda but, as this left it open to charges of cultural imperialism, it preferred to act out of the limelight. So it was that the coalition sent consultants and embedded technical experts in ministries, courts, municipalities, universities, and public agencies in country after country to advance its agenda. These in turn issued reports and carried out national training programs.

The USAID-led coalition also acted through local proxies, non-governmental organizations, that it funded and supported. They organized media campaigns, conferences, and rallies to promote their specific issues, whether they were gender ideology or climate change.

Taken together, these various progressive organizations constituted a formidable political force, even though their USAID-imposed agenda was almost totally disconnected from the real needs of Nicaraguans and Peruvians.

"When the population demanded hospitals, medicines, and primary healthcare, USAID and its allies offered 'sexual and reproductive health.' While children needed to be fed and to learn to read, write, and reason, they were offered so-called 'comprehensive sexuality education' based on the concept of self-perceived 'gender,'" wrote Carlos Polo, head of PRI's Latin American office.[2]

"When millions of Ibero-Americans had to emigrate because of the lack of employment and leave their families behind, labor policies focused on 'LGBTQ non-discrimination' were promoted," he continued. "When neighborhoods demanded security, they were told about 'intersectional approaches.' When families asked for stability, they were offered 'deconstruction.'"

As this suggests, the Left did not advance in Latin America because it was popular, but because it received massive external support from the USAID-led coalition. The result was that the politics of entire countries were skewed in a leftist direction that did not represent the values of the people of those countries.

Once USAID was shut down, the coalition lost its organizer, the money stopped flowing, and the experts went home.

And the now-weakened Left started losing elections to conservatives who promised to meet the citizens' real needs: basic health care, real education, public safety, decent employment, and an end to public corruption.

As for the now-defunct USAID, it betrayed its own mission. It was originally set up to promote democracy, and it wound up distorting, even assaulting, it. It was originally set up to promote economic development and alleviate poverty, and it wound up hamstringing it.

America, Latin America, and, for that matter, the world is a better place without it.

Letter to the editor

"For decades, Steven Mosher has been a courageous and influential voice exposing the Chinese Communist Party's assault on human dignity, the sanctity of life, and religious freedom. Since the late 1970s, when he became the first American social scientist to conduct an in-depth study of a Chinese village, Mosher has almost single-handedly exposed the devastating human cost of China's coercive population policies, including its brutal one-child policy. Through his work, he has brought international attention to this barbaric practice and the Party's other abuses, including the persecution of generations of Chinese Catholics who have endured imprisonment, torture, and martyrdom.".

Here's What You Helped PRI Accomplish in 2026

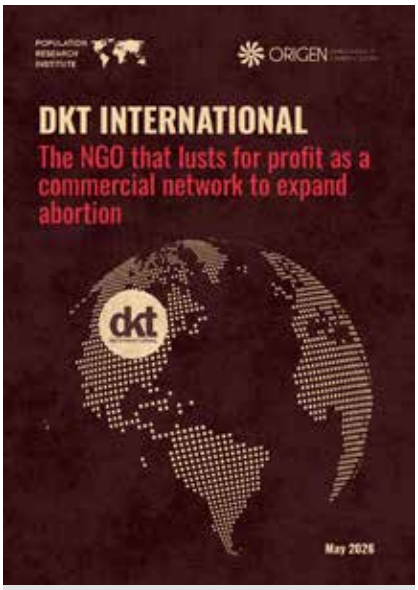

BY STEVEN W. MOSHER

A Message from the President

This has been a historic year for PRI and for me personally. Goals that PRI has been working on for years—decades, really—have not only been achieved, but exceeded. In 1985 I worked with the Reagan administration to pass the Kemp-Kasten Amendment, which led to the cut-off of funding to the UN Population Fund under this and subsequent Republican administrations. But this time around we not only cut off $377 million in funding, but we also completely withdrew from the rogue population control organization. Good riddance!

Even more important is the historic closure of the U.S. Agency for International Development. PRI has been working for decades to defund USAID's radical gender, environmental and population control programs. The agency was finally shut down last year, and 90% of its programs were cancelled. We are monitoring the remaining programs, mostly comprising direct aid to refugees and famine victims, to make sure that population control efforts are kept out.

In more good news, our Latin American office, under the leadership of Carlos Polo, has reported that the elimination of U.S. funding for the radical pro-abortion Left in Latin America has led to a new birth of freedom on the continent, with a half-dozen new pro-life, pro-family presidents elected. Carlos and his team are helping to advance pro-life laws and policies throughout the region.

The fired USAID population control employees are reorganizing, seeking new funding from the Gates Foundation, and are going all out to push the Abortion Pill on young women through social media. This year, we had two of our employees go undercover at the FP2030 conference in Bogota, Columbia, and produced an extensive report. A second report followed, exposing the biggest abortion provider in the world: DKT International which now is responsible for even more abortions than the International Planned Parenthood Federation. Carlos Polo's team is putting together two more reports, exposing the pro-abortion agendas of Ipas and My Voice My Choice, for early 2027. You have to know how the enemies of life operate in this new environment before you can effectively combat them.

In Europe, the PRI-supported Goodlove Foundation continues to offer sexual and affective education for young people in line with Catholic teaching in 33 countries including Australia, Japan, and various other nations across Africa, Europe, Asia, and Latin America. We expanded the program to the United States as well, starting with a joint program with schools in Miami, Florida as well. The effort is overseen by Dr. Carlos Beltramo, Director of PRI Europe, who himself has given dozens of talks across multiple continents to spread the word about Goodlove.

The PRI ultrasound program continues apace, as we helped equip fully Catholic and pro-life health care providers in Nigeria and Kenya with this vital technology. By allowing women to see their babies in the womb and receive critical prenatal care, these machines, along with the two dozen others already in place in various countries, help protect both mothers and children.

We continue our efforts to help Chinese women in crisis pregnancies by funding Safe Houses, as well as helping to support the Church in China in various ways, not least by publicizing their continued persecution through articles and speeches. I tell the inspiring story of how the Catholic Church in China continues to thrive despite Communist persecution in my new book, The Underground Church, which will be published in January 2027 by Sophia Institute Press.

PRI is active on the home front as well. We are pressing our friends in the Trump administration—the most pro-life administration in American history—to issue an Executive Order on Overpopulation to finally rid the federal government, including our schools, of poisonous anti-people propaganda once and for all. Our online petition to this effect garnered over 20,000 signatures and has been sent to the White House.

As you all know, the end of Roe v. Wade has not meant the end of abortion in the U.S. Rather, it has merely shifted the battleground to the states. Four states had critical abortion measures on their ballots this fall—Missouri, Virginia, Nevada, and Idaho—and we were able to reach over 1 million people through a social media campaign to urge voters to vote pro-life. We continue to urge the administration to restrict the sending of the Abortion Pill through the mail, and put earlier restrictions on its use, jettisoned by Biden, back in place.We are also joining other pro-life groups in urging the administration to debar Planned Parenthood from federal funding!

Keeping you up-to-date with our efforts to defeat abortion and promote Life has filled the pages of this and five other PRI Reviews, 50 PRI Insiders, and more than 50 original Weekly Briefings in 2026 alone. I myself penned several dozen articles for The Epoch Times, LifeSiteNews, and The New York Post, and the London Times, while PRI staff members Chiara McKenna and Samantha Lejeune were active on the publication front as well.

PRI was also a presence at major pro-life and Catholic events across the country, and in the national media. In addition to over a 100 interviews on TV, radio, and podcasts, I was privileged to be the keynote speaker at over a dozen events. When I spoke on the international pro-life situation at the National Right to Life Conference one of my seventeen (and counting, always counting!) grandchildren was in attendance!

Our Executive Vice President, Thomas Mosher, represented PRI at the National Pro-Life Summit, Bring America Back to Life Conference, Cleveland Right to Life, and Virginia Homeschool Convention, among other events.

We at PRI are grateful beyond words for your unwavering prayers and support, and enter 2027 with renewed zeal for our God-given mission. We will never stop defending the right to life of the most vulnerable among us. Every life is precious.

From the Countries

NEPAL
Ipas Uses National Disaster to Push Abortion

Following devastating flooding in Nepal, pro-abortion organization Ipas Partners for Reproductive Justice is raising money to distribute $20 "dignity kits" containing hygiene supplies. But Ipas is primarily using this disaster to advocate for access to contraception and abortion, and identifying "safe abortion" as a critical reproductive-health need for women and girls affected by the flooding.[1]

LIECHTENSTEIN
Liechtenstein Prince Blocks Abortion Expansion

Liechtenstein's Hereditary Prince Alois has vetoed legislation that would have legalized abortion during the first 12 weeks of pregnancy. The bill, narrowly approved by parliament in a 13–12 vote, would also have lifted restrictions on advertising abortion and allowed health insurance to cover abortions. The royal family defended its decision, stating that the legislation failed to adequately protect unborn life. Liechtenstein remains one of Europe's few countries with strict pro-life protections.[2]

ICELAND
Iceland Leads Abortion Push at the UN

Iceland has emerged as the most aggressive advocate for abortion and gender ideology at the UN's Universal Periodic Review (UPR), where countries assess one another's human rights records. During the latest session, 14 countries received nearly 3,900 recommendations, with most focusing on issues other than abortion, sexual orientation, gender identity, and comprehensive sexuality education. However, Iceland stood out by issuing more than 20% of the 124 recommendations concerning sexual orientation and gender identity, as well as over 60% of those relating to abortion. Despite Iceland's strong push to promote these controversial policies internationally, the countries it criticized often merely "noted" its recommendations rather than "supported" them, indicating that they did not formally endorse its positions.[3]

POLAND
Poland Votes to Expand Abortion

Poland's parliament has approved two bills that would roll back protections for unborn babies. The first would overturn a 2020 Constitutional Tribunal ruling protecting unborn babies diagnosed with fetal abnormalities, while the second would decriminalize helping women obtain illegal abortions, an offense currently punishable by up to three years in prison. The bills passed by votes of 233–203 and 217–213, respectively. However, there is hope that pro-life President Karol Nawrocki will veto both measures.[4]

UNITED KINGDOM
UK Removes Penalties for Illegal Abortions

The UK Government has admitted that women in England and Wales can no longer be criminally prosecuted for intentionally deceiving doctors about gestational age to obtain abortion pills beyond the legal limit. The Government has published an Equalities Impact Assessment on the 'abortion up to birth' clause in the Crime and Policing Act 2026, which removes criminal penalties for women who perform their own abortions for any reason, including sex selection, at any stage of pregnancy, even right up to birth. With the passage of this law, women who have previously been convicted or warned for criminal offences related to abortion in regard to their own pregnancies will be pardoned, and relevant records are to be deleted.[5]
